Why is this select query: select * from (select * from tbl1 union all select * from tbl2 union all select * from tbl3) t where t.x = 1 much more efficient than: select * from tbl1 union all select * from tbl2 union all select * from tbl3 where t.x = 1 A: The first version executes the same number of joins, but it may not execute them in the same order. In the second version the order of the joins has no influence on performance and the optimizer can optimize it in one way. In the first version the order of the joins may be different but the SQL engine can never be sure which is the fastest. This is a well known gotcha in SQL. I encountered it while implementing Triggers to help the designer of MySQL to model dimensional data. You can read more about it here and here. In this particular case it does not make much difference since the result set is cached. Always remember that queries (especially derived tables) that are not well normalized will result in worse performance, even if the results are f678ea9f9e
